Voices of Autistic Women

When I found out I was autistic I didn't really believe it for several years. I thought that to be genuinely autistic you either had to be either winning Nobel prizes or unable to speak – and if you were somewhere in the middle with a house, a partner and a job – did that really count?

I grew in self-acceptance when I found people on social media and in the real world who were speaking openly about being autistic and were just like me.

Autistic women are often overlooked or not represented. That might be because much of the research into autism has been done on men, and there is even a theory that autism is "an extreme male brain". Another reason put forward is that there is more pressure on girls to be social, and so they learn to mask more completely to fit in, whereas it can be more acceptable for (some) boys to be allowed to be solitary or exhibit autistic behaviour.

I think that's why it's important to promote the voices of autistic women, in case you find someone "just like you". Also I've enjoyed a lot of the following recommendations because they are awesome, talented people and deserve to be heard.

I appreciate there's a huge risk that I could be accused of mansplaining with this blog post, so let me clarify that the following suggestions have come from autistic women in my life and clients that I've been lucky to work with.

(Many autistic women identify as non-binary, so they are also included.)
